At Spedster, we believe the top three rankings represent more than shiny new products on the block, but a true indicator of a major shift in the EdTech industry as a whole. Once dominated by monoliths like Pearson and Houghton Mifflin, the market is now moving away from the mega-publishers and towards more innovative, smaller companies with a commitment to and passion for the field of special education. The thread moving through each of these IEP products/companies is a focus on extending beyond that of simple databases and repositories of information. These companies are focusing on ease of use, ease of communication, movement and flow of copious amounts of information, and the placement of priority of facilitating the teaching and learning process. With the field of artificial intelligence still in its infancy, we believe that the speed of innovation and true advancements in the field of special education will continue to be dominated by smaller, innovative, and nimble companies with a true spirit for advocacy and change.
